DOCUMENTS

AN EXEGETICAL FRAGMENT OF THE THIRD CENTURY.

THE document here printed was discovered and copied independently by myself in 1902 and by my friend Dr. G. Mercati, then of the Ambrosian but now of the Vatican library, some years earlier. The right to first publication belonged indubitably to him, and his edition has in fact lately appeared (with other material) as No. 11 of the Vatican *Studi e Testi*¹. But inasmuch as my own text was in type before I knew that I had been anticipated in the discovery, and seeing also that the document is one which from its age and character deserves all the attention which students can bestow upon it, I have ventured, with Dr. Mercati's full consent, to publish the treatise, although no longer an anecdoton, in the pages of the JOURNAL.

Not only in the discovery of the document, but in the edition of its text, Dr. Mercati and myself have been wholly independent of one another: and the very close agreement which on important points exists between our respective results is I hope an indication of their substantial correctness. In order to emphasize the extent of our independent agreement, I have not thought it proper to modify in any way the form of my own presentation of the text; and it will therefore be convenient, even at the risk of anticipating the logical arrangement, to call attention at once to the principal variations between our two editions.

In the arrangement and division of the chapters, which are of course not marked as such in the MS, Dr. Mercati and I agree, I think, in every case except that he begins his second chapter a line and a half later than I do, with the words 'quia humana fragilitas'. Of the few passages which I have been able neither to understand nor to emend, and have therefore marked as corrupt, (1) ch. iii, l. 17 is beautifully restored by Mercati through a simple transposition of two words 'hoc enim illi poenale est, si quod non uult perdidesse et ipse se perdidesse fateatur': (2) ch. vi, l. 9 'patiatur', he notes id est, sustineat, toleret . . . uel fort. nonnulla exciderunt: (3) ch. viii, ll. 17, 18 he prints 'quo raptu ipso terrore mortem sicut soporem patientur, et comportati, dum ad Dominum perueniunt, reuuiscentes resurgent'; (4) ch. ix, l. 17 he prints the MS text, and notes 'id est monstrabit se regem esse et suos unius Dei honore gloriosos': (5) in ch. x, ll. 42, 43 he emends 'et Domino, qui uita est, in maiestate sua praesente magis dignum, quod concupiscentia edulium esse non potest': (6) ch. xix, l. 4 he follows the MS, but doubts whether the passage may not contain a corruption: (7) ch. xix, l. 23 for 'ut meritum conlocetur' he writes 'ut merito conloquitur'.

Other noteworthy readings introduced by Dr. Mercati into his text are—ch. iii, l. 21 'dominari' for MS 'damnari'; ch. iv, l. 12 'boni fruentur uita, mali uero' for 'uitam alii', a simple and satisfactory emendation that ought not to have escaped me; ch. vi, l. 14 'infirmatae' for 'infirmitate'; ch. x, l. 44 'ali ut prius cogatur' for 'aliut conatur'; ch. xi, l. 25 'auidus' for 'abitus'; ch. xiii, l. 7 'de vii diebus vii anae' (i. e. septimanae) for 'de vii dies vii anni', which is at least very ingenious; ch. xiv, l. 4 'sic' for 'sed'; ib. l. 40 'prouiuere' for 'prouenire' (I conjecture 'non inuenire'); ch. xvi, l. 3 'fatus' for 'faus' (I have proposed 'fraus'); ch. xix, l. 16 'adseruimus' for 'adseruemus'; ib. l. 27 'insperatum' for 'speratum', and 'tutos' for 'totos'.

In two or three places his edition has enabled me to correct slips or omissions in my own: ch. ii, l. 5 reference to Wisdom iv 11 should be given in the margin, and ch. xv, ll. 4, 5 reference to 2 Cor. v 7; ch. xiv, l. 20 after 'passi' the word 'statim' should be inserted; ch. xviii, l. 1 'ergo' should of course have been 'erga'. But on the whole our results harmonize in a rather remarkable degree.

I ought to add that, following on the exposition of the eschatological passage, Matt. xxiv 20–44, the MS gives two short pieces, de tribus mensuris and de Petro apostolo, which may perhaps be drawn from the same source. Dr. Mercati has printed them both.

Many interesting problems offer themselves for solution in reading through this newly recovered document. What is its age? is the Latin form in which we have it original, or a version from the Greek? is it an independent whole, or an extract from a complete commentary on St Matthew's Gospel? And lastly, when these questions have been considered and as far as possible answered, who was its author?

The document emanates from the age of persecutions. 'The sign of the beast on the forehead or on the hand' is interpreted of the wearing of the laurel crown upon the head and of the casting of incense on the 'altar of abomination' (ch. xix, l. 8): the former is familiar to us as the theme of Tertullian's fierce declamation in the de corona militis, the latter was the official test of apostasy in all the persecutions at least from Decius onwards. Again humanity is divided into the three classes of 'iusti', 'peccatores', and 'impii' (ch. xiv 16-28, xix 6), that is to say, good Christians, bad Christians, and heathen, a distinction being drawn between the 'impii', who perish, and the 'peccatores', who are punished in proportion to their sins: and this prominence of the heathen as a separate class in the eschatological conception of the writer points us back to the time when heathenism was still dominant. Chiliasm, too, is still an absorbing topic of interest: not only is our writer himself a Chiliast, albeit a moderate and reasonable one, but he has to take serious account of a rampant and offensive Chiliasm which maintained that the saints during the thousand years' reign would eat the good things of the earth and drink at the Lord's table in His kingdom in the crudest and most material sense. We need feel no hesitation in attributing our fragment to the third century or at latest to the very earliest years of the fourth.

If the writer was a Greek churchman, it would be natural to place him somewhat before the later boundary of the limits just laid down, since Chiliasm was extinct in the Greek much earlier than in the Latin church: but the question of the original language of the treatise is a much more difficult one than its date. We have not here to deal with an artistic and literary whole, the finish and setting of which would inevitably be tarnished in the process of transference from one language to another; in such cases it may be possible to say with confidence whether a writing bears the impress of a single hand or no: but it is clear that this sort of criterion does not admit of easy application to exegetical matter. Another and perhaps more serious ground for hesitation attaches specially to the Latin Christian writings of the time when ecclesiastical Latin was still in process of making: for its mode of thought and its technical language often betray such obvious marks of their ultimate Greek origin that the decision whether any particular document is a translation into Latin, or an original Latin production of a writer imbued with Greek ideas and Greek training, becomes peculiarly difficult. Tertullian was no doubt neither the only nor the last Latin Christian who composed in both languages: and in writers of less individuality than Tertullian this bilingual facility would result in a graecised Latin that might be hard to distinguish from the Latin rendering of a Greek original. Therefore if I suggest that our document may be only a translation, it must be understood that the suggestion is propounded tentatively and with full appreciation of the reasons that make for caution. But the cumulative effect of the following instances collected from my apparatus criticus seems to me sufficient to warrant the claim of the hypothesis as at least a possible alternative:—ch. viii, l. 11 'rapiemur in nubibus, id est a ministris nubibus', ἀρπαγησόμεθα ἐν νεφελᾶς, τοῦτ' ἔστιν ὑπὸ λειτουργῶν [τῶν] νεφελῶν—the dative with ἐν can be instrumental in Greek, but hardly so the ablative with ‘in’ in Latin : ch. xiii, l. 7 ‘de vii dies’, περὶ τοῦ Ἐπτὰ ἡμέρας—Mercati avoids this by writing ‘de vii diebus’: ch. xiv, l. 5 ‘quia Christo resurgentē’, ὡς Χριστοῦ ἀνισταμένου : ch. xiv, l. 34 ‘meruerunt resurgere’ of the resurrection of sinners, ἡξιώησαν : ch. xvii, l. 11 ‘de eius accipit,’ ἐκ τοῦ [ἔμοι] λαμβάνει, Jo. xvi 15 : ch. xix, l. 10 ‘sed qui etiam hi qui christiani erant . . . cesserunt,’ ὅσοι δὲ καὶ χριστιανοὶ ὄντες . . . , where Mercati simplifies the Latin construction by writing ‘sed quia etiam hi qui christiani erant ac . . . cesserunt’.

It is worthy of mention in this connexion, though one would not wish to lay undue stress on the fact, that the Muratorian Canon, which is found in the same MS as our document and at no great distance from it, is also according to all probability a translation from the Greek.

If then we have to face the possibility that the Latin as we have it is not original, the limits of date as given above will of course apply only to the Greek original, not to the Latin translation. Yet the translation itself must belong at latest to a time not appreciably removed from the inferior limit, that is to say, from the early years of the fourth century. The decisive factor in this case is the character of the Latin biblical text, which has striking affinities with some of our oldest authorities. In particular we are fortunate in possessing in the ad Fortunatum of St Cyprian (§ 11, Hartel i 335) a continuous quotation of Matt. xxiv 4–31, —a passage which for its last twelve or thirteen verses runs parallel with the opening chapters of our document : and a summary comparison of these verses with Cyprian and the chief Old Latin MSS of the Gospels will sufficiently guarantee the early character of the text.

If we tabulate the results, we find that our document has with a eighteen agreements, and with each of the other four continuous texts thirteen or fourteen agreements, out of the thirty-six cases. It is, perhaps, more really instructive to note the cases in which it goes with the better of two readings where these five ancient authorities are divided against each other. Thus in 1 it goes with Cyprian; in 4 with e Cypr. Iren. 1/2; in 11 with Cypr. Auct. rebapt.; in 16 with d Cypr.; in 17 with d e Cypr.; in 18 with e Cypr.; in 25 with Cypr. Iren.; in 29 it is closest to Cypr.; in 32 it goes with d e Cypr.; in 33, 34, with e Cypr.; in 35 with a b Cypr. It is clear that, on the whole, though it is not an 'African' text, it approaches more nearly to the 'African' text of e Cyprian than do the typical fourth-century texts a and b.

We conclude then, so far, that the original document belongs to the third century or at latest to the early years of the fourth, and that the form in which it comes to us, even if not itself original, cannot be much later than this. We now proceed to enquire whether the probabilities point to its being complete in itself, or whether, alternatively, it is to be regarded as a selection from a larger whole, such as a commentary on the entire Gospel of St Matthew. It is perhaps the most convenient method of approaching this problem, although it will involve some digression, to commence by asking what commentaries on this Gospel are known to have been written in the ante-Nicene period, and which of them come into serious consideration as the possible source of our fragment.

St Jerome, in the preface to his own commentary on St Matthew (A.D. 387: ed. Vallarsi vii 6), gives the following enumeration of those who had preceded him in the task of exposition: 'legisse me fateor ante annos plurimos in Mattheum Origenis viginti quinque volumina et totidem eius Homilias, commaticumque interpretationis genus; et Theophili Antiochenae urbis episcopi commentarios, Hippolyti quoque martyris, et Theodori Heracleotae, Apollinarisque Laodiceni, ac Didymi Alexandrini; et Latinorum Hilarii, Victorini, Fortunatiani opuscula.' Of these nine commentators, Theodore of Heraclea, Apollinaris of Laodicea, and Didymus of Alexandria among the Greeks, Hilary of Poitiers and Fortunatian of Aquileia among the Latins, are post-Nicene, and do not therefore concern us on this occasion. There remain of the Greeks Theophilus of Antioch, Hippolytus, and Origen, of the Latins Victorinus of Pettau: and to one of these, as the only known ante-Nicene expositors of St Matthew, our fragment must be presumed to belong, if its source is to be found in a systematic commentary. But the alternatives open can be reduced within narrower limits still. The commentary of Origen is extant for the whole of the latter part of the Gospel in an old Latin translation (ed. de la Rue, iii 521-931), and cannot possibly represent the same original as our fragment: while it is equally certain that the fragment, if it is part of a larger whole at all, must come from a commentary and not from either 'homilies' or 'scholia'. And in any case the Millenarianism of our document, however moderate it may be, would put out of court at once any claim on the part of Origen to be regarded as its author. The case for Theophilus of Antioch, again, is too slight to be taken into serious account. Even if we defer to Jerome's authority in admitting the existence and genuineness of a work about which Eusebius in his catalogue of Theophilus's writings (H.E. iv 24) is wholly silent, we could not bring it into relation with our fragment, which bears all the marks of the more developed literature of the third century, while the episcopate of Theophilus came to an end before the last decade of the second. If we have to choose among the commentators, the choice reduces itself to the two names of Hippolytus and Victorinus.

That Hippolytus really wrote a commentary on St Matthew's Gospel may be accepted on the authority of Jerome's preface to his own commentary as indubitable, in spite of the fact that neither of the two earliest lists of his works—that inscribed on the chair of his statue at Rome, and that contained in Eusebius H.E. vi 22—contain any mention of it. The Chair is silent as to exegetical works altogether¹, though we know that Hippolytus wrote for instance on the book of Daniel and on the Song of Songs: and Eusebius concludes his list with the caution that 'very many other works' of this author would be found on research to be extant. That Hippolytus wrote in Greek was unfavourable to the circulation of his writings in the West; that he wrote in or near Rome was equally unfavourable to their circulation in the East. It would therefore in any case be hardly surprising that the commentary should have soon dropped out of sight: and the disappearance would be still easier to explain if the lost writing were not a commentary in the fullest sense of the word, if it were not, that is, a continuous exposition of the text of the Gospel from beginning to end. More than one consideration may be thought to point in this direction. The parallel enumeration in Jerome of expositions of 1 Corinthians—'latissime hanc epistulam interpretati sunt,' ep. 49 § 3 (A.D. 393)—includes several writers such as Dionysius, Pierius, and Eusebius, who certainly, so far as we know, never composed complete commentaries on the epistle. Moreover, in the days of Hippolytus the biblical commentary as a department of Christian literature was still in its infancy: and even a writing entitled Eis τὸν Μαθθαῖον or Eis τὸ κατὰ Μαθθαῖον need not have meant more than a discussion of particular sections or aspects of the Gospel. The titles of other works of Hippolytus sufficiently shew that eschatology was a specially congenial theme: and it is significant in this respect that all the fragments of any considerable compass which can be referred with probability to the lost commentary on St Matthew belong without exception to the twenty-fourth chapter. (a) In Hermathena vii 137–150 (A.D. 1890) Dr. J. Gwynn published with English translation an extract from the Syriac commentary of Dionysius Bar-Salibi on the Apocalypse (MS Brit. Mus. Rich 7185), which cites Hippolytus's explanation of Matt. xxiv 15–22, and gives in the margin the additional reference to 'the interpretation of the Gospel', i.e. to a definite commentary: Harnack Altchr. Literatur i 641, appears to accept this attribution, but Gwynn, while not doubting the Hippolytean authorship, speaks with reserve as to the actual source of the quotation, and Achelis in the Berlin edition of Hippolytus (I ii 243–246: A.D. 1897) prints it among the fragments of the 'Capitula against Gaius'. (5) From Coptic, Ethiopic, and Arabic catenae, which all represent a single (doubtless Greek) source, Achelis op. cit. 197–207 prints German translations of interpretations ascribed to Hippolytus covering Matt. xxiv 15–34. The Syriac comment overlaps slightly, the Egyptian overlaps largely, the passage expounded in our Latin document: and the general character of the relationship is that of similarity of thought without any such marked contact as we should expect in independent versions of a common original. If therefore the Oriental fragments belong to the commentary on the Gospel, then, unless they have suffered unusually in the process of transmission, the Latin can hardly belong to it as well: if on the other hand they are drawn from Hippolytus indeed, but from sources other than the commentary, then the attribution of the Latin to the commentary would explain at once its similarity to them in general thought and its divergence in expression and in detail. Here the matter may be left, while something is said about the other commentator whose claims must be compared with those of Hippolytus.

Victorinus of Petavio or Pettau, on the borders of the Greek and Latin speaking worlds, was according to Jerome, de viris illustribus 74, better acquainted with Greek than with Latin: if he wrote chiefly or exclusively in the latter tongue, this was the necessary consequence of a definite aim which he had set before himself. Victorinus in fact—and the aim was a noble one, however inadequate its execution—wished to familiarize the Latin Christian world, which down to that time (he was martyred in the persecution of Diocletian) appears to have possessed no exegetical literature of its own, with the thoughts and methods of Hippolytus and Origen. So much we learn from repeated statements of Jerome: ep. 36 § 16 ad Damasum (A.D. 384) 'Hippolyti martyris uerba... a quo et Victorinus noster non plurimum discrepat': ep. 61 § 2 ad Vigilantium (A.D. 396) 'taceo de Victorino Petabionensi et ceteris qui Origenem in explanatione dumtaxat scripturarum securi sunt et expresserunt': ep. 84 § 7 ad Pammachium (A.D. 400) 'nec disertiores sumus Hilario nec fideliores Victorino, qui eius [sc. Origenis] tractatus non ut interpretes sed ut auctores proprii operis transtulerunt'. These passages do not apply only or primarily to the commentary on St Matthew, but there is no reason to exclude it from their purview. And if either Hippolytus or Origen was here the model of Victorinus, the probabilities are distinctly in favour of Hippolytus.

We know that the commentary of Origen was of enormous length and prolixity: we have seen reason to believe on the other hand that the work of Hippolytus may have been no more than a partial and incomplete exposition: and the language of Cassiodorus, de institutione divinarum litterarum § 7, ‘Mattheum . . . de quo et Victorinus ex oratore episcopus nonnulla disseruit,’ suggests that the same was the case with Victorinus.

That Victorinus is connected in some way or other with our document, either as actually its author or, if it is drawn from a Greek source, as its translator, appears more than probable. If the arguments for regarding the Latin as a translation are sound, then no name can be put forward for the authorship of the original so likely as Hippolytus. Perhaps the indications given by Jerome suggest that the truth lies with neither of these alternatives exclusively but midway between them, and we may suppose Victorinus to have worked partly as ‘author’ and partly as ‘interpreter’ in the composition of perhaps the earliest piece of Latin exegesis that has come down to us.

 ergo post millae annos in gloria erunt, quia dixit CETERI MORTVORVM

Matt. xxiv passa cognoscendi se studium minime consequatur, dicit Dominus Sicut 5
